

Federal Buildings Personnel Training Act (FBPTA)

The Federal Buildings Personnel Training Act (FBPTA) of 2010 requires all federal personnel providing building operations and maintenance services to demonstrate competencies necessary to effectively operate government facilities.

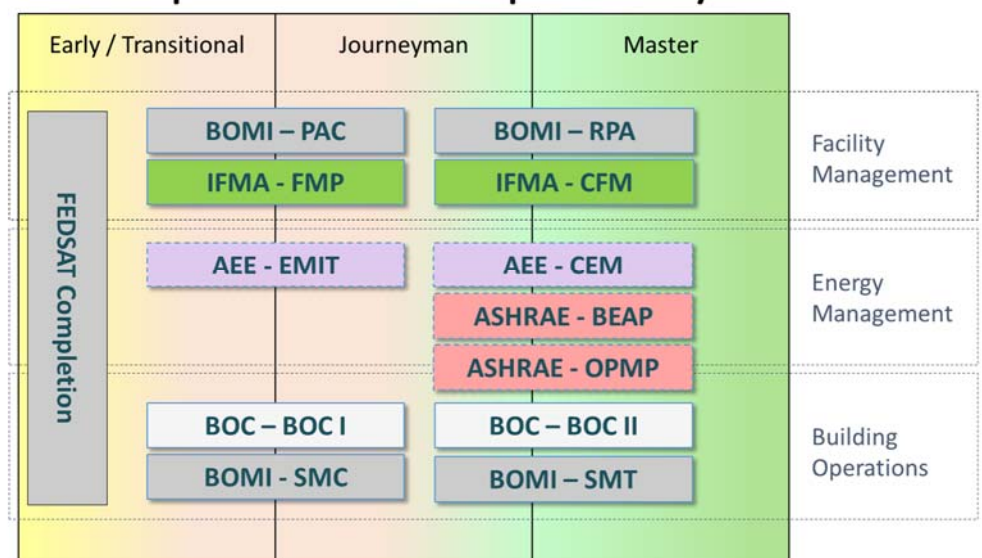

Requirements of the FBPTA

- Core competencies for federal buildings personnel
- Recommended curriculum and continuing education
- Annual updates to competencies and curriculum
- Method for contractor compliance

Overview

- When: FBPTA became law in 2010
- Why: U.S. Federal Government is the largest property owner in the world and increased operational effectiveness can save up to $2 Billion annually.
- How: FBPTA requires individuals managing federal properties to have necessary “core competencies” to effectively operate government facilities.
- What: Facilities Management Institute (FMI) was developed to identify those required skills and create a roadmap for necessary training required to meet the needs of the affected professionals.

Long Term Career Development and Continual Professional Development Training

FBPTA : Advance Your Career

FBPTA is based on:

- Excellence – The program utilizes established industry standards as guidelines to enable a successful assessment and training program.
- Reflective Practice – The program focuses on career development and continual professional development planning.
- Collaboration – The FBPTA program is a collaborative effort between industry and government and strives for staff and supervisors to work together to develop individual training needs.
- Integrity – Having a transparent, measurable program in place allows for fairness and accountability in the way agencies can conduct their training program.
